CensorNet is a finalist in this year's New Statesman New Media Awards
London, 2003

The New Statesman, Britain's leading political magazine, announces the short listing of CensorNet in their New Media Awards in the category of Safety on the Net. Since 1999, these awards have promoted projects that embrace new technology, fresh thinking and creative management in the UK.

The key themes of this year's awards are "innovation, accessibility and efficiency". They intend to award those who have really achieved something good for society.

"We hear a great deal about how the internet and such like will improve our lives," says Peter Wilby, editor of the New Statesman. "This project aims to look at how far the digital revolution has really brought us."

Bristol based Adelix Ltd, creators of CensorNet are leading Linux solution providers in the UK with a particular focus on Internet Management and Security

Notes to editors

This is the fifth year that the New Statesman has conducted the New Media Awards. This year the awards are in association with SchlumbergerSema, a global technology services company.

Anyone with an eligible example of ICT in public life is welcome to nominate it for review. Nominations are accepted until 31 May 2003. Highest achieving nominations will be awarded a prize at an awards ceremony in Central London in July.

The expert panel of judges – including John Kampfner, political editor of the New Statesman, and Amy Vickers, Technology Editor for Trinity Mirror – will be seeking to highlight those who have used new technology to benefit society by delivering tangible improvements at all levels of public life.
